

Body Language: Writers on Sport

Gerald Early

Graywolf Press (March 1998)

$16.00 (232pp)

978-1-55597-262-2

While the more eloquent of sports writing has traditionally centered on baseball, this second collection of essays in an ongoing series of forums covers many arenas of physical endeavor with consistently fine, and occasionally exemplary, prose.

For Vijay Seshadri, an immigrant from India, the assimilation into American culture is rendered less problematic by a near-obsessive devotion to right-fielder Roberto Clemente, himself an immigrant. In "A Higher Plane" Wayne Fields observes the evolution of basketball, from a largely horizontal pastime for earthbound white players to a more vertical display of astounding athleticism, more often than not practiced by talented black athletes. Loc Wacquant examines the multitude of sacrifices made by prizefighters in training, whether dietary or sexual, and Teri Bostian struggles with the prickly question of whether a gifted girl kickball player should go easy on the boy she likes in "The Natural."

Picking the best entry here isn't easy, but David Foster Wallace's evocative recollection of his own fleeting teen-age tennis stardom is masterfully juxtaposed with the unearthly incidence of tornado-force winds which periodically swept across his Southern Illinois hometown. Other contributors include Jonis Agee and Gerald Early himself.

PETER ROBERTSON (May / June 1998)

Disclosure: This article is not an endorsement, but a review. The publisher of this book provided free copies of the book to have their book reviewed by a professional reviewer. No fee was paid by the publisher for this review. Foreword Reviews only recommends books that we love. Foreword Magazine, Inc. is disclosing this in accordance with the Federal Trade Commission's 16 CFR, Part 255.